

Judges 18:11

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And there went from thence of the family of the Danites, out of Zorah and out of Eshtaol, six hundred men appointed with weapons of war.

Analysis

And there went from thence of the family of the Danites, out of Zorah and out of Eshtaol, six hundred men appointed with weapons of war. The phrase "six hundred men appointed with weapons of war" (shesh-me'ot ish chagur keli milchamah, שְׁשׁ-מֵאוֹת אִישׁ חָגוּר כְּלֵי מִלְחָמָה) describes a military expedition, not a peaceful migration. The number 600 appears elsewhere in military contexts (Judges 3:31, 1 Samuel 13:15, 14:2), possibly representing a standard military unit. These were warriors ready for conquest, demonstrating Dan's commitment to the unauthorized mission.

The departure from "Zorah and Eshtaol" emphasizes they left established settlements—they weren't refugees fleeing disaster but settlers abandoning God's assigned territory for perceived better options. From a Reformed perspective, this illustrates how disobedience often involves not merely passive failure but active rejection of God's provision. Dan had land, had towns, had established presence; their problem wasn't absence of blessing but unwillingness to fight for complete possession of what God had given. This warns against the temptation to abandon God's assignments when they require sustained effort and faith.

Historical Context

The mobilization of 600 warriors from just two towns suggests either these were major settlements or that Dan's population in their allotted territory was modest.

The number may represent a select contingent rather than Dan's entire military force. Historical context: this migration likely occurred during the early judges period (c. 1200-1150 BC) when tribal organization was still fluid and centralized authority weak. The ease with which 600 men departed on an unauthorized conquest mission demonstrates the political fragmentation characterizing this era —there was no king or judge to prevent or authorize such tribal decisions.
