

Luke 1:65

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And fear came on all that dwelt round about them: and all these sayings were noised abroad throughout all the hill country of Judaea.

Analysis

Fear falling on all dwelling around them demonstrates appropriate response to manifest divine power. This 'fear' (Greek 'phobos') combines awe, reverence, and recognition of God's presence. The result—'all these sayings were noised abroad throughout all the hill country'—shows how God's extraordinary works generate witness. That these events spread widely prepared the region for John's later ministry. The community's fear wasn't terror but holy recognition that God was working among them. This response models how divine intervention should produce both worship and testimony. The spreading of these events built expectation for God's continued work.

Historical Context

The Judean hill country, relatively small and close-knit, would have rapidly spread news of miraculous pregnancy, naming controversy, and speech restoration. This prepared the region to recognize John as one marked by God when he later emerged to preach.
