

Luke 2:28

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Then took he him up in his arms, and blessed God, and said,

Analysis

Then took he him up in his arms (καὶ αὐτὸς ἐδέξατο αὐτὸ εἰς τὰς ἀγκάλας, kai autos edexato auto eis tas agkalas)—The Greek verb dechomai means 'to receive' or 'welcome,' suggesting deliberate acceptance. Simeon physically embraces the infant Messiah, a prophetic act symbolizing Israel's longed-for reception of salvation.

And blessed God (εὐλόγησεν τὸν θεόν, eulogēsen ton theon)—Simeon's immediate response is doxology. Having received God's greatest gift, he returns praise. The moment fulfills decades of Spirit-sustained expectation, as the aged prophet cradles the infant King who would cradle him into eternal rest. This tender scene captures the intimacy between faith's patience and promise's fulfillment.

Historical Context

Jewish blessing (berakah) was the standard response to recognizing God's acts. Simeon's public blessing in the temple courts would have attracted attention, as elderly men didn't typically embrace strangers' infants. His prophetic authority, recognized by regular temple worshippers, lent weight to his declaration.
