

Luke 20:2

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And spake unto him, saying, Tell us, by what authority doest thou these things? or who is he that gave thee this authority?

Analysis

Tell us, by what authority doest thou these things? or who is he that gave thee this authority? The question ἐξουσία (exousia, authority) appears twice, emphasizing the central issue. Exousia means legitimate power, jurisdiction, or right to act—not mere ability but authorized permission. "These things" (ταῦτα, tauta) refers to teaching in the temple, proclaiming the gospel, and especially cleansing the temple (19:45-46).

The double question creates a false dilemma: identify the source of authority. If Jesus claims divine authority, they'll charge Him with blasphemy. If He claims human authority (like the prophets commissioned by God), they'll demand credentials. Jesus' response (vv. 3-8) masterfully exposes their bad faith—they're not genuinely seeking truth but setting a trap. This question reveals the fundamental conflict between human religious authority and divine authority breaking into the establishment.

Historical Context

Temple authorities controlled who could teach in the courts. Rabbis derived authority from recognized teachers in the chain of tradition. Jesus had no formal rabbinic training (John 7:15) and claimed authority directly from God, bypassing the establishment. The leaders' question was legally proper—they had responsibility to protect the temple from false teachers. However, their earlier rejection of John the Baptist (whom they also questioned, John 1:19-28) and their opposition to Jesus' miracles revealed hearts closed to divine authentication.

Study Questions

1. How do religious leaders today sometimes demand credentials while rejecting clear evidence of God's work?
2. What is the difference between genuinely seeking to understand authority versus using authority questions as a trap?
3. Why is the question of Jesus' authority still the central issue every person must answer?
