

Luke 24:34

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Saying, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon.

Analysis

Peter's testimony: 'Saying, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon.' When the Emmaus disciples returned to Jerusalem, they found the Eleven declaring: 'The Lord is risen indeed' (Ὡντως ἠγέρθη ὁ Κύριος, Ontōs ēgerthē ho Kyrios, truly the Lord has been raised), 'and hath appeared to Simon' (καὶ ὤφθη Σίμωνι, kai ōphthē Simōni). The adverb 'indeed' (Ὡντως, Ontōs) indicates certainty—this isn't speculation but verified fact. That Jesus appeared to Simon Peter (mentioned nowhere else except 1 Corinthians 15:5) is significant. Peter had denied Jesus three times; this private appearance likely involved restoration. That the church highlights Peter's testimony despite his failure demonstrates grace's triumph. Resurrection guarantees restoration for all who've failed but repent.

Historical Context

Peter's resurrection encounter is crucial but under-reported. Only Luke 24:34 and 1 Corinthians 15:5 mention it, with no narrative details. This private meeting likely parallels John 21:15-19, where Jesus restored Peter after his denials. That Jesus appeared to Peter individually before appearing to the group demonstrates grace's personal nature—Jesus seeks the wounded, the ashamed, the failed. Peter's restoration qualified him for leadership—at Pentecost, he boldly preached Christ (Acts 2). His failure and restoration made him compassionate toward others (1 Peter 5:10, 2 Peter 3:9). The principle applies universally: Christ meets repentant failures privately before using them publicly. Restoration precedes service.
