

Luke 9:4

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And whatsoever house ye enter into, there abide, and thence depart.

Analysis

Whatsoever house ye enter into, there abide (μείνατε, meinate)—Jesus commands stability, not house-hopping for better accommodations. The aorist imperative emphasizes decisive action: pick one household and stay there. This instruction counters the temptation to upgrade lodging based on hospitality quality or social advantage.

Thence depart (ἐξέρχεσθε, exerchesthe)—When leaving the town, depart from that same house. This creates accountability and prevents the appearance of greed or favoritism. The disciples' conduct must not discredit their message. Paul later echoed this principle, supporting himself to avoid burdening new converts (1 Thessalonians 2:9). The missionary's credibility depends on contentment and gratitude, not social climbing.

Historical Context

In first-century Palestine, hospitality was sacred duty, but itinerant teachers were common and could exploit generosity. Cynics and wandering philosophers sometimes moved between homes seeking better meals or patronage. Jesus's instruction protected both the disciples' integrity and their hosts from being used. The Twelve were traveling light (verse 3) and dependent on local support during their preaching mission through Galilee.
