

Mark 14:35

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And he went forward a little, and fell on the ground, and prayed that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from him.

Analysis

And he went forward a little, and fell on the ground (ἐπιπτεν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς)—the imperfect tense suggests repeated prostration, not a single act. This vivid detail, unique to Mark's eyewitness account (likely from Peter), shows Christ's profound agony. The Greek proseucheto (ἤρχετο προσεύχεσθαι) implies continuous, agonizing prayer, not casual petition.

That, if it were possible, the hour might pass from him (ἵνα εἰ δυνατόν ἔστιν παρέλθῃ ἀπ' αὐτοῦ ἡ ὥρα)—'the hour' (ἡ ὥρα) is Mark's technical term for Christ's appointed time of suffering and death (cf. Mark 14:41). The conditional 'if it were possible' acknowledges divine sovereignty while expressing genuine human distress. This demonstrates the hypostatic union: Christ's fully human will recoiling from the cup of divine wrath, even as His divine will remains fixed on redemption. He bore not merely physical death but the infinite weight of sin and separation from the Father.

Historical Context

Gethsemane ('oil press') was an olive grove on the Mount of Olives, a place Jesus frequented for prayer (Luke 22:39). Mark's Gospel, traditionally based on Peter's testimony, provides the most visceral details of Christ's agony—Peter witnessed this scene from a distance before falling asleep. Written circa AD 50-60 for Roman Christians facing persecution, this passage showed that even Christ wrestled in prayer under extreme duress.

Study Questions

1. How does Christ's genuine distress in prayer challenge shallow views of His humanity or superficial approaches to suffering?
2. What does Jesus's submission ('if it were possible') teach about aligning your will with God's sovereignty in times of anguish?
