

Mark 2:11

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house.

Analysis

Jesus addresses the paralytic directly with three imperatives: 'I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house.' The emphatic 'I say unto thee' (σοὶ λέγω, soi legō) asserts Christ's personal authority—not 'God says' or 'in God's name,' but 'I say.' This first-person authority claim distinguishes Jesus from prophets who spoke for God; Jesus speaks as God. The command to 'arise' (ἐγείρε, egeire) uses terminology associated with resurrection (the same verb appears in Mark 5:41; 16:6), symbolically connecting physical healing with spiritual resurrection from sin's death. The command to 'take up thy bed' reverses his condition—the bed that carried him now becomes his burden to carry. Reformed theology sees this miracle as illustrative of effectual calling—Christ's powerful word creates what it commands.

Historical Context

The κράβατος (krabattos, 'bed' or 'pallet') was a simple sleeping mat used by the poor, easily carried when rolled up. Jesus performed this miracle publicly in a crowded house, providing undeniable evidence before hostile witnesses. The command to return home demonstrated thorough healing—the man could navigate streets, stairs, and distance. The immediacy of healing contrasts with gradual ancient medical treatments. This miracle, like many in Mark, emphasizes Jesus' power over all human afflictions.
