

Mark 3:29

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

But he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation:

Analysis

But he that shall blaspheme against Holy Ghost has never forgiveness but is in danger of eternal damnation. But de adversative contrast. Blaspheme blasphēmēsē speak evil attribute evil to good. Against Holy Ghost eis to Pneuma to Hagion. Specific sin attributing Spirit work to Satan. Has never forgiveness ouk echei aphanesin eis ton aiōna no forgiveness ever. But alla strong contrast. Is in danger enochos guilty liable. Eternal damnation aiōniou hamartēmatos eternal sin guilt. Unforgivable sin final impenitent rejection of Spirit testimony to Christ. Not casual doubt or struggle but deliberate persistent calling good evil light darkness. Reformed theology distinguishes unforgivable sin from temporary doubts struggles. True believers may doubt but do not finally reject Christ persistently attribute His work to Satan. Those worried about committing it have not their concern proves Spirit still working.

Historical Context

Pharisees had witnessed undeniable miracles healing casting out demons. Yet attributed this to Satan (Beelzebub 3:22). Calling Spirit work demonic reveals hardened hearts beyond conviction. Jesus warns this trajectory leads to point of no return. First-century exorcists used magic rituals. Jesus simple authoritative command clearly different. Attributing this to Satan was willful blindness. Church history shows varying interpretations of unforgivable sin. Some thought apostasy. Others final impenitence. Augustine emphasized dying in unbelief. Reformers emphasized final rejection of gospel. Concern about having committed it indicates one has not. Hardened hearts do not care.
