

Mark 3:35

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother.

Analysis

Jesus redefines family: 'Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother.' This isn't disrespect for Mary and siblings (3:31-32) but declaration that spiritual family supersedes biological. The criterion for relationship is doing 'the will of God'—not mere profession but obedient faith. John's Gospel explains God's will is believing in Christ (John 6:40). Faith evidences itself through obedience (James 2:17). This creates radical new community transcending natural kinship, ethnicity, and social class. Reformed theology sees here the doctrine of the church as covenant family, united by Spirit-wrought faith, more fundamental than earthly ties. Jesus' household consists of those who hear God's word and do it (Luke 8:21). This warns against presuming salvation through Christian heritage while assuring believers of intimate relationship with Christ.

Historical Context

Jesus' mother and brothers sought Him, possibly to restrain Him because some thought He was 'beside himself' (3:21). Family concern for reputation, fear of Roman or Jewish authorities, or misunderstanding His mission motivated their interference. In honor-shame culture, family ties were paramount—individual identity derived from family. Jesus' teaching that spiritual kinship transcends biological was revolutionary and offensive. It created conflict for early disciples: following Christ might mean family rejection (Matthew 10:34-37). Yet it also created new family—the church—where spiritual siblings support one another.

This passage encouraged Gentile converts and Jews excommunicated from families, assuring them of belonging in God's household.
