

Matthew 16:17

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven.

Analysis

Jesus declares Peter 'blessed' because this revelation came from 'my Father which is in heaven,' not human reasoning. Saving knowledge of Christ is divinely revealed, not humanly achieved. Reformed doctrine's emphasis on divine initiative in salvation finds clear support here—natural man cannot discover Christ's true identity through intellect alone. The Father's revelation through the Holy Spirit enables recognition of Jesus as Lord (1 Corinthians 12:3). This verse demolishes any notion of salvation by human wisdom or effort.

Historical Context

The Aramaic 'Bar-jona' (son of Jonah) identifies Peter's human lineage, contrasting with his spiritual insight from the heavenly Father. In Jewish thought, revelation came through prophets; Jesus affirms the Father directly revealed truth to Peter. This personal revelation parallels Old Testament prophetic experience while pointing to the Holy Spirit's New Covenant ministry of illumination.
