

Matthew 20:11

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And when they had received it, they murmured against the goodman of the house,

Analysis

And when they had received it, they murmured against the goodman of the house (λαβόντες δὲ ἐγόγγυζον κατὰ τοῦ οἰκοδεσπότου, labontes de egonguzon kata tou oikodespotou)—The verb γογγύζω (gonguzō, to murmur, grumble) is the same used for Israel's wilderness complaints against God (Exod. 16:7-8, LXX). Their murmuring is not against fellow workers but against the goodman (κατὰ τοῦ οἰκοδεσπότου, kata tou oikodespotou), the master of the house. This exposes the heart issue: their quarrel is with God's sovereign grace, not merely wage distribution.

The tragedy is that when they had received it (λαβόντες, labontes)—having obtained precisely what was promised—they complain. Receipt of covenant blessing doesn't guarantee a grace-shaped heart. Like the Pharisees who resented Jesus eating with sinners (Luke 15:2), these workers reveal that long tenure can breed entitlement rather than gratitude. Their murmuring demonstrates that time served doesn't automatically produce mature faith.

Historical Context

Murmuring (γογγυσμός, gongusmos) was Israel's characteristic sin in the wilderness, expressing distrust of God's provision and character. Jesus's original audience would hear echoes of their ancestors' faithlessness. The parable confronts first-century Jewish believers tempted to resent God's grace to Gentiles and sinners, viewing it as injustice rather than mercy.
