

Numbers 16:22

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And they fell upon their faces, and said, O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall one man sin, and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation?

Analysis

Moses and Aaron pray: 'O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall one man sin, and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation?' This title emphasizes God's sovereignty over all human life - He gives spirit/breath to every person (Gen 2:7, Job 12:10, Zech 12:1). The prayer appeals to God's justice, arguing that corporate punishment for individual sin violates His character. God's response vindicated this appeal - separating the righteous from Korah's company before judgment (v.23-27). This demonstrates God's discrimination in judgment, punishing guilty while sparing innocent. The title foreshadows Hebrews 12:9, 'the Father of spirits,' emphasizing God's authority and knowledge of each person.

Historical Context

This prayer came after God threatened to destroy the entire congregation for Korah's rebellion (v.21). Moses and Aaron's intercession distinguished between active rebels and the rest of Israel, appealing to God's just character. God's acceptance - commanding the congregation to separate from the rebels - showed that corporate punishment falls only on those who actively participate in or support sin. The earth swallowing Korah's company (v.31-33) and fire consuming the 250 offering incense (v.35) dramatically demonstrated God's precise justice. This principle continues - God judges individuals, not indiscriminately punishing the innocent with the guilty (Ezek 18).
