

Philippians 2:13

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure.

Analysis

For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure (θεὸς γὰρ ἐστὶν ὁ ἐνεργῶν ἐν ὑμῖν καὶ τὸ θέλειν καὶ τὸ ἐνεργεῖν ὑπὲρ τῆς εὐδοκίας, theos gar estin ho energōn en hymin kai to thelein kai to energein hyper tēs eudokias)—Gar ("for") grounds v. 12: you work out salvation because God works in you. Ho energōn (present participle, "the one working") indicates continuous divine activity. En hymin ("in you") locates God's work internally. The scope: kai to thelein kai to energein ("both to will and to work")—God produces both desire (willing) and action (working).

Hyper tēs eudokias ("according to His good pleasure") identifies God's sovereign purpose as motive. This verse balances v. 12's human responsibility with divine enablement—the classic Reformed tension between God's sovereignty and human agency. We work because God works; divine working doesn't eliminate but enables human working. Augustine summarized: "God's commands are not against grace; commands are fulfilled by grace." The phrase resolves potential misunderstanding: working out salvation isn't self-sufficient moralism but Spirit-dependent obedience.

Historical Context

This verse became central in Augustinian-Pelagian debates (5th century) over grace and free will. Pelagius emphasized human ability; Augustine emphasized divine grace enabling human response. Philippians 2:12-13 holds both: genuine human responsibility (work out) and absolute divine priority (God works in you).

Reformation theology (sola gratia) drew heavily on this balance. Monergism (God alone saves) and synergism (God and humans cooperate) find nuance here.
