

Proverbs 20:29

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

The glory of young men is their strength: and the beauty of old men is the gray head.

Analysis

This verse contrasts youth's vitality with age's dignity. 'Glory of young men is their strength'—physical vigor, energy, and prowess. But 'beauty of old men is the gray head'—accumulated wisdom, experience, and character forged through years of faithful living. Both stages have appropriate value and contribution. The young should use strength for productive work and defense; the old should offer wise counsel born of long obedience. Each generation needs the other: youth provides energy and innovation; age provides wisdom and perspective. To despise either is foolish. The church especially should honor elderly saints who have walked with God faithfully, treasuring their counsel and learning from their experience.

Historical Context

Ancient cultures generally honored the elderly for their wisdom, though youth and strength were also celebrated. The fifth commandment to honor parents implied respecting age generally.

Study Questions

1. Do you honor and seek wisdom from those older than you, or do you despise their counsel?
2. How can younger and older generations in the church better support and learn from each other?
