

Proverbs 21:25

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

The desire of the slothful killeth him; for his hands refuse to labour.

Analysis

---

The sluggard's desire becomes his executioner—'the desire of the slothful killeth him.' He wants outcomes without effort, prosperity without work. His hands 'refuse to labour,' yet he craves the fruit that only labor produces. This internal contradiction destroys him. Desire without corresponding action produces only frustration, poverty, and death. The sluggard demonstrates that good intentions mean nothing without implementation. Believers must not only desire righteousness but pursue it diligently. Faith without works is dead; desire without labor is deadly. The solution isn't eliminating desire but directing it properly and accompanying it with faithful diligence. Work is God's appointed means of provision; refusing it is rebelling against His design.

Historical Context

Agrarian economies made the connection between labor and survival immediate. Modern welfare systems can obscure this principle but don't eliminate it—sloth still produces poverty and dysfunction.
