

Proverbs 21:26

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

He coveteth greedily all the day long: but the righteous giveth and spareth not.

Analysis

The wicked 'coveteth greedily all the day long'—constantly consumed by desire for more. By contrast, 'the righteous giveth and spareth not'—consistently generous without holding back. These opposite orientations reveal different heart conditions. The wicked person operates from scarcity mentality and selfish grasping; the righteous from abundance consciousness and generous trust in God's provision. Covetousness violates the tenth commandment and demonstrates idolatry—making material things ultimate. Generosity reflects God's character and trust in His promises. The righteous person gives freely because he understands that everything belongs to God and that generosity produces blessing. Conversion transforms economic behavior from hoarding to stewardship and from grasping to giving.

Historical Context

Israel's law included provisions for systematic generosity—tithes, gleaning rights, Jubilee debt forgiveness. Righteousness expressed itself through economic justice and generosity.
