

Proverbs 27:8

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

As a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place.

Analysis

As a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place—The Hebrew noded (תַּדְּבֵר, 'wanders/flees') suggests restless instability, not purposeful travel. The bird that abandons her qen (קֶן, 'nest') leaves eggs or fledglings vulnerable to predators. Similarly, a man who wanders from his maqom (מָקוֹם, 'place/position') abandons responsibilities, relationships, and calling for rootless instability.

This isn't condemnation of all travel but of chronic instability—the perpetual malcontent who believes fulfillment lies elsewhere. Wisdom literature consistently values stability, faithfulness, and contentment in one's appointed sphere (Ecclesiastes 10:4, Proverbs 17:24). The grass appears greener where you don't water it.

Historical Context

Israelite society was strongly rooted in family land inheritance (nachalah) and community responsibility. Abandoning one's place meant forsaking covenant obligations, social connections, and the stability that enabled flourishing. The wisdom tradition, reflecting Ancient Near Eastern values, prized loyalty and rootedness over restless ambition.
