

Psalm 105:45

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

That they might observe his statutes, and keep his laws.

Praise ye the LORD.

Analysis

---

This verse reveals the purpose of redemption: covenant obedience. 'That they might observe his statutes, and keep his laws' shows that salvation is not an end in itself but the means to holy living. The Hebrew shamar (שָׁמַר, 'keep') means to guard, watch over, or give careful attention to. Israel was redeemed from Egypt not merely for freedom but for service to God. This refutes antinomianism—grace doesn't nullify law but empowers obedience. 'Praise ye the LORD' (Hallelujah, הַלְלָיְהוּ) concludes the psalm with worship, showing that obedience and praise are the proper responses to redemption. The purpose clause ('that they might') teaches that election, redemption, and providence all serve sanctification.

Historical Context

---

After the exodus and conquest, God gave Israel the Law at Sinai to govern their covenant life. The ethical, ceremonial, and civil laws distinguished Israel from pagan nations, making them a holy people. Their obedience (or disobedience) would demonstrate God's character to the watching world (Deuteronomy 4:5-8). The psalm ends where it began—with praise—showing that recounting God's faithfulness should culminate in worship.
