

Psalms 107:18

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat; and they draw near unto the gates of death.

Analysis

This verse describes the severity of affliction. 'Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat' means loss of appetite—food becomes repulsive. 'And they draw near unto the gates of death' depicts life-threatening condition. 'Gates of death' (shaar maveth, שַׁעַר מָוֶת) is boundary language—they're at death's threshold. This terminal condition emphasizes helplessness: they can't heal themselves, can't even eat for strength. Only divine intervention can rescue from death's gates. This prefigures Christ, who 'descended into hell' (Apostles' Creed), entering death's realm to liberate captives and destroy death's power (1 Peter 3:18-20; Hebrews 2:14-15).

Historical Context

Near-death sickness appears throughout Scripture: Hezekiah (Isaiah 38), Job (Job 2:7-8; 17:1), David (Psalm 6:4-5), Epaphroditus (Philippians 2:27). Each required God's intervention to escape death's gates. The imagery appears in Jesus' promise that 'the gates of hell shall not prevail' against the church (Matthew 16:18)—death cannot hold God's people. Resurrection guarantees passage through death's gates to life.
