

Psalm 124:6

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Blessed be the LORD, who hath not given us as a prey to their teeth.

Analysis

The conditional section concludes with blessing: 'Blessed be the LORD, who hath not given us as a prey to their teeth.' The word 'blessed' (Hebrew 'baruch') shifts from hypothetical destruction to actual praise. The phrase 'who hath not given us' affirms that God prevented what would have naturally occurred. The imagery 'as prey to their teeth' returns to the swallowing metaphor (v. 3), now showing it didn't happen. 'Prey' suggests helpless victims; 'teeth' emphasizes the predatory nature of enemies. The verse celebrates deliverance as accomplished fact - God DID act, enemies DIDN'T prevail. This creates the psalm's pivot from imagining disaster to celebrating rescue. Blessing God for what He prevented is as important as blessing Him for what He provided. Sometimes greatest mercies are disasters averted.

Historical Context

Throughout Israel's history, God prevented enemies from completely destroying His people - a pattern of preservation despite overwhelming odds. Even when judgment came (exile), God preserved a remnant. The language of 'prey' and 'teeth' fits the predatory behavior of ancient empires that sought to devour smaller nations completely (Jeremiah 50:17).
