

Psalm 126:3

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

The LORD hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad.

Analysis

The testimony is owned by God's people: 'The LORD hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad.' This verse mirrors what the nations said (v. 2), now spoken by Israel themselves. The repetition emphasizes agreement between outside observers and internal experience - both recognize God's greatness. The possessive 'for us' claims the blessing personally and corporately. The phrase 'whereof we are glad' provides the proper response to divine work. The Hebrew 'sameach' (glad) denotes joy, delight, and celebration. Gladness is appropriate, even obligatory, response to God's great acts. The verse models how testimony should move from observation to ownership - from seeing what God did to confessing what God has done 'for us.' This personal appropriation deepens gratitude and solidifies faith.

Historical Context

The confessional nature of this verse suggests liturgical use - possibly corporate worship where the community affirmed together what God had accomplished. Such confessions reinforced shared identity as recipients of divine mercy and prevented individuals from forgetting communal deliverance. The pattern of corporate testimony appears throughout Israel's worship (Psalms 105-106; 135-136).

Study Questions

1. Why is it important to personally own and confess what God has done rather than just observe it?
2. How does the shift from 'them' (v. 2) to 'us' (v. 3) model proper appropriation of God's work?
3. What is the relationship between recognizing God's greatness and experiencing gladness?
4. How does corporate confession ('we are glad') strengthen individual faith?
5. What practices help believers remember and regularly confess God's 'great things'?
