

Psalm 126:5

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.

Analysis

A principle of sowing and reaping is introduced: 'They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.' This agricultural metaphor connects planting in difficult circumstances with eventual harvest in better times. 'Sowing in tears' captures the experience of faithful labor during suffering - continuing kingdom work despite pain, loss, or opposition. Tears represent sorrow, grief, or hardship accompanying present effort. The promise 'shall reap in joy' guarantees future harvest that corresponds to faithful sowing. Reaping produces joy proportionate to sowing's difficulty. This principle applies to multiple contexts:

1. literal return from exile and rebuilding
2. spiritual labor that seems fruitless
3. suffering that eventually produces character and blessing
4. evangelism and discipleship that bear fruit over time.

The verse encourages perseverance by promising that tearful sowing isn't wasted - joy-filled harvest will come.

Historical Context

Post-exilic returnees literally sowed crops in difficult conditions - land had been desolate 70 years, infrastructure was destroyed, opposition was intense (Nehemiah 4; Haggai 1:6). Planting seemed futile, yet God promised fruitfulness. The metaphor also captures the exile experience itself - suffering seemed permanent, yet restoration came. The principle assured struggling communities that faithfulness during hardship produces future blessing.
