

Psalms 135:7

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth;
he maketh lightnings for the rain; he bringeth the wind out of his treasures.

Analysis

God's sovereignty over nature receives poetic elaboration through meteorological phenomena: vapours rising, lightning flashing, wind emerging from divine 'treasuries' (otsarotav). The Hebrew 'nesi'im' (vapours, mists) describes water vapor ascending from earth's extremities - a process ancients observed but could not explain scientifically. The phrase 'lightnings for the rain' captures the connection between electrical storms and precipitation. Most striking is the image of wind stored in God's treasures, suggesting divine storehouses from which He dispenses atmospheric forces. This language, nearly identical to Jeremiah 10:13, portrays God as cosmic manager with unlimited resources. Weather, often feared and worshiped by pagans (Baal was a storm god), is merely a tool in Yahweh's hand. Jesus demonstrated this same authority when He rebuked wind and waves (Mark 4:39).

Historical Context

This verse is virtually identical to Jeremiah 10:13 and 51:16, suggesting either common liturgical source or deliberate quotation. Baal worship, prevalent in Canaan, centered on the storm god believed to control rain and agricultural fertility. By attributing weather phenomena to Yahweh, Israel directly challenged Baal's supposed domain.
