

Psalms 139:23

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts:

Analysis

This imperative prayer invites God's penetrating examination through paired synonymous verbs: 'search' (chaqar—to investigate thoroughly) and 'know' (yada—intimate knowledge). The parallel 'heart' (leb) and 'thoughts' (sar'appim—disquieting thoughts or anxieties) encompass the inner life. David's invitation for divine scrutiny reflects confidence in God's omniscience (verses 1-6) and gracious judgment. The prayer for God to 'try' (bachan—test, examine, as refining metal) demonstrates the believer's desire for sanctification. This vulnerability anticipates the Christian call to self-examination (2 Corinthians 13:5) and God's future judgment (1 Corinthians 4:5).

Historical Context

Psalms 139 celebrates God's omniscience, omnipresence, and creative sovereignty. David wrote from mature awareness of his own sin (Bathsheba, Uriah) and God's faithful discipline. The psalm reflects Israel's covenant relationship where God judges to purify, not merely to condemn. Ancient Near Eastern religion feared capricious gods, but Israel's God offers redemptive examination.
