

Psalms 3:2

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Many there be which say of my soul, There is no help for him in God. Selah.

Analysis

David voices the painful taunts of his enemies who mock his faith in God's deliverance. The Hebrew 'yeshuah' (help/salvation) comes from the same root as 'Yeshua' (Jesus), pointing forward to the ultimate Savior. 'Selah' appears here, likely a musical pause for meditation on this devastating accusation. Yet even in quoting his enemies' lies, David's faith shines through - he still addresses God directly. This psalm, written during Absalom's rebellion, foreshadows Christ's suffering when enemies mocked His trust in the Father (Matthew 27:43).

Historical Context

Written when David fled from his son Absalom's coup (2 Samuel 15-18), one of David's darkest hours. The rebellion seemed to vindicate those who questioned God's faithfulness to His anointed king. Yet God ultimately vindicated David, demonstrating that human circumstances don't negate divine promises.
