

Psalms 31:7

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy: for thou hast considered my trouble; thou hast known my soul in adversities;

Analysis

I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy: for thou hast considered my trouble; thou hast known my soul in adversities. David moves from petition to praise, demonstrating faith that rejoices before deliverance because God's mercy is already at work in acknowledging suffering.

The future tense (I will be glad) based on past tense (thou hast considered) reveals faith's logic. David chooses joy based on God's attention. Thy mercy (hesed) is covenant lovingkindness—loyal, steadfast love that never abandons. David rejoices not in relief but in unchanging divine character.

Thou hast considered uses Hebrew ra'ah—to see with understanding and purpose. God sees, understands, and acts for His suffering children. Thou hast known my soul intensifies this—God knows intimately, experientially, the depths of David's adversity.

Reformed theology emphasizes God's particular, electing love. He specifically sees and knows each chosen one in individual afflictions. This personal knowledge grounds Christian assurance.

Historical Context

God considering and knowing suffering echoes Exodus 3:7—God saw Israel's affliction and knew their sorrows. David places himself in redemptive history.

Ancient Near Eastern laments moved from complaint to confidence. David deepens this theologically—confidence rests on God's covenantal character (hesed), not past miracles alone. Covenant mercy is unchanging foundation for joy amid unchanging circumstances.
