

Psalm 37:15

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Their sword shall enter into their own heart, and their bows shall be broken.

Analysis

Poetic justice appears: the sword meant for others enters the attacker's 'own heart,' and bows break before use. This principle of self-inflicted judgment appears throughout Scripture (Esther 7:10, Proverbs 26:27). The Hebrew 'lev' (heart) represents the vital center—the very weapon aimed at victims fatally wounds the assailant. God's judgment often uses the wicked's schemes against them, teaching that evil is ultimately self-destructive. This doesn't require divine intervention so much as the intrinsic consequences of sin.

Historical Context

Ancient warfare stories celebrated reversals where attackers fell by their own weapons. David had witnessed this pattern repeatedly, learning to trust God's justice rather than fear enemies' weapons.

Study Questions

1. Have you seen instances where evil schemes backfired on their perpetrators?

2. How does this principle encourage you to leave justice to God rather than plotting counter-attacks?
