

Psalms 86:5

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

For thou, Lord, art good, and ready to forgive; and plenteous in mercy unto all them that call upon thee.

Analysis

For thou, Lord, art good, and ready to forgive; and plenteous in mercy unto all them that call upon thee. This verse grounds David's petitions in God's character, using three divine attributes that justify bold prayer. Good (טוֹב, tov) encompasses moral perfection, benevolence, and beneficial nature—God's essential character inclines toward His creatures' welfare.

Ready to forgive translates salach (סָלַח), a verb used exclusively of divine forgiveness in the Old Testament. The phrase literally means "forgiving" or "pardoning," emphasizing God's eagerness to pardon rather than reluctance requiring persuasion. This anticipates the New Testament revelation of God's initiative in forgiveness through Christ's atoning work.

Plenteous in mercy (rav-chesed, רַב־חֶסֶד, abundant in steadfast love) describes overflowing covenant loyalty extending to all them that call upon thee. The universality of this offer—anyone who calls receives mercy—finds fulfillment in the gospel's proclamation that "everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved" (Acts 2:21, quoting Joel 2:32).

Historical Context

This verse echoes the foundational self-revelation of God to Moses: "The LORD, the LORD, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness" (Exodus 34:6). This creedal statement of divine character recurs throughout the Old Testament (Numbers 14:18, Nehemiah 9:17, Psalms 103:8, 145:8, Joel 2:13, Jonah 4:2), functioning as Israel's core theology. David appeals to this revealed character as basis for confident prayer.
