

Revelation 11:14

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

The second woe is past; and, behold, the third woe cometh quickly.

Analysis

The transition from second woe to third (seventh trumpet) builds dramatic tension. The rapid succession ('behold, the third woe cometh quickly') emphasizes escalating urgency as history approaches consummation. Reformed eschatology sees these judgments as progressive revelation of God's victory over evil. The woes represent increasing severity, yet also decreasing duration before final judgment. This structure demonstrates God's sovereignty over history's timeline—each stage unfolds according to divine decree, neither hastened nor delayed by human action. The 'quickly' warns against presuming on time for repentance.

Historical Context

The woe structure builds on prophetic patterns where judgments increase in intensity (Egypt's plagues, Jeremiah's warnings). First-century believers facing persecution needed assurance that history was moving toward God's appointed consummation. The 'quickly' reminded them that despite apparent delays, God's timeline was accelerating toward Christ's return and final judgment.
