

Revelation 16:4

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

And the third angel poured out his vial upon the rivers and fountains of waters; and they became blood.

Analysis

The third angel pouring his vial on rivers and fountains, turning them to blood, parallels Egypt's first plague (Exodus 7:19-21). This judgment strikes fresh water sources, making them undrinkable and deadly. The completeness ('became blood') emphasizes total corruption, not partial contamination. Reformed theology sees these judgments as both literal and symbolic—literal consequences of sin's curse on creation, symbolic of spiritual death. The progression from sea (v. 3) to fresh water sources shows comprehensive judgment affecting all water—nowhere to escape contamination. This answers the martyrs' blood shed unjustly (v. 6).

Historical Context

Water sources were vital for ancient cities' survival. Contaminated water brought disease and death. The plague recalls Egypt's judgment for enslaving Israel. First-century believers understood this imagery as just recompense—persecutors who shed believers' blood would themselves thirst, finding only blood to drink. The reversal emphasized divine justice.
