

Romans 11:10

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, and bow down their back alway.

Analysis

Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see—skotisthētōsan (σκοτισθήτωσαν) is an aorist passive imperative, expressing David's prayer for judicial blinding. The continuation of Psalm 69:23 adds: and bow down their back alway (synkampson dia pantos, σύγκαμψον διὰ πάντος). This depicts permanent subjugation, a bent back that cannot straighten—a posture of burden and bondage.

The imagery is powerful: spiritual blindness leads to perpetual slavery. Those who reject truth become enslaved to error. Yet Paul's use of this text is not to declare Israel's permanent rejection but to explain their temporary hardening (v. 25). The phrase "alway" (dia pantos) seems permanent, but Paul will reinterpret this in light of Israel's future restoration (vv. 26-27). The judicial hardening is real but not final.

Historical Context

The imagery of a 'bent back' would resonate with Roman readers familiar with conquered peoples bearing burdens of slavery. Ironically, Israel—called to be a kingdom of priests—bears the burden of judicial hardening for rejecting their King. Yet this is not the end of their story.

1. How does spiritual blindness lead to spiritual bondage, and what does this teach about the progressive nature of rejecting truth?
2. What hope is implied by Paul quoting this 'permanent' judgment in a context where he will argue for Israel's future restoration?
3. How do we avoid the hardening that comes from misusing spiritual privileges?
