

Romans 11:8

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

(According as it is written, God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear;) unto this day.

Analysis

Paul now supports verse 7's hardening claim with Scripture: (According as it is written, God hath given them the spirit of slumber—pneuma katanyxeōs (πνεῦμα κατανύξεως), literally "spirit of stupor" or deep sleep. This conflates Isaiah 29:10 and Deuteronomy 29:4, showing a divine judicial act. God gave (edōken, ἔδωκεν) this stupor—the hardening is not merely permissive but active, though in response to their rejection.

Eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear—this echoes Isaiah 6:9-10, the paradigmatic hardening text Jesus quoted (Matthew 13:14-15). The phrase unto this day (heōs tēs sēmeron hēmeras, ἕως τῆς σήμερον ἡμέρας) shows the hardening continued into Paul's era. Israel's spiritual insensitivity was not new—it marked their history from Moses forward. Yet Paul's "unto this day" implies this condition is temporal, not eternal—a key point he'll develop (vv. 25-26).

Historical Context

Isaiah 29:10 warned of spiritual dullness during Judah's declining years before exile. Paul applies this prophetic pattern to first-century Israel's rejection of Messiah. The 'hardening' explains why Jesus taught in parables (Mark 4:11-12)—judicial blinding of those who persistently rejected light.

Study Questions

1. How does God's judicial hardening differ from simply abandoning people to their choices?
2. What warning does this verse provide about the danger of persistent rejection of revealed truth?
3. How does the phrase 'unto this day' suggest both continuity (ongoing hardening) and limitation (not forever)?
