

Romans 14:7

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself.

Analysis

For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself—The Greek οὐδεὶς γὰρ ἑμῶν ἑαυτῷ ζῇ (oudeis gar hēmōn heautō zē) emphasizes complete corporate solidarity in Christ. Paul uses the strong double negative to obliterate radical individualism: believers exist in mutual interdependence. The parallel construction (living/dying) spans all of existence—every moment belongs to the community, not autonomous self.

This verse demolishes the false dichotomy between 'personal faith' and 'corporate Christianity.' The dative ἑαυτῷ (heautō, 'to himself') shows that self-referential existence is impossible for those in Christ's body. Even death—the most solitary human experience—is a corporate event affecting the whole church. Paul grounds his argument about disputable matters (ch. 14) in this ontological reality: your dietary choices, Sabbath observance, and conscience decisions impact the entire body because you don't exist as an isolated unit.

Historical Context

Written from Corinth (AD 57) to a church torn by Jewish-Gentile tensions over food laws, holy days, and purity regulations. Roman house churches were small (20-40 people) meeting in close quarters where one person's practices directly affected others. The cultural context was highly collectivist—Roman patronage systems, Jewish covenant community, and Greco-Roman household codes all emphasized group identity over individualism. Paul's argument would have resonated naturally with his original audience.
