

Romans 7:22

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

For I delight in the law of God after the inward man:

Analysis

For I delight in the law of God after the inward man—Synēdomai gar tō nomō tou theou (συνήδομαι γὰρ τῷ νόμῳ τοῦ θεοῦ, "I rejoice together with the law of God") uses a compound verb indicating deep pleasure and agreement. Kata ton esō anthrōpon (κατὰ τὸν ἔσω ἄνθρωπον, "according to the inner man") describes the regenerate self—the new creation in Christ.

This verse decisively proves Paul describes regenerate experience. The unregenerate "receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God" (1 Corinthians 2:14) and cannot "delight in God's law"—such delight requires regeneration. The "inner man" is renewed by the Spirit (2 Corinthians 4:16, Ephesians 3:16), producing genuine love for God's revealed will. This doesn't mean perfect obedience but authentic desire—the hallmark of new birth. Paul's struggle isn't whether to obey but how to overcome remaining resistance.

Historical Context

Reformed theology consistently identifies 'delight in God's law' as evidence of regeneration. The unregenerate may respect, fear, or externally obey law, but they don't 'delight' in it. This inner pleasure in God's will—despite imperfect performance—distinguishes Christian struggle from pre-Christian rebellion. Paul grounds assurance in regenerate affections, not perfect achievement.
