

Song of Solomon 5:4

Authorized King James Version (KJV)

My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved for him.

Analysis

My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door (dodi shalach yado min hachor, דודי שָׁלַח יָדוֹ מִן־הַחֹר)—the beloved reaches through the door's opening, attempting entry despite the bride's hesitation. This demonstrates persistent love that doesn't abandon the reluctant beloved but continues seeking access. The imagery is both literal (physical door) and metaphorical (the heart's door).

And my bowels were moved for him (umeay hamu alav, וַיִּמְעֵי הָמוֹ עָלָיו)—the Hebrew meay (מְעֵי, bowels/inward parts) represents the seat of deep emotions. Hamu (הָמוֹ, were moved/stirred/yearned) suggests intense emotional response—the bride's heart is stirred to action. Seeing her beloved's hand reaching for her breaks through her complacency. This teaches that experiencing Christ's persistent, reaching love overcomes spiritual lethargy. Revelation 3:20 echoes this: "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock"—Christ persistently seeks entrance to lukewarm hearts.

Historical Context

Ancient doors had openings or latches that allowed someone outside to reach through and manipulate the lock from inside. The beloved's reaching hand demonstrated both his authority (he could enter) and his patience (he waited for welcome, not forcing entry). The physical gesture became spiritually powerful—seeing his hand moved the bride from excuses to action. Early church fathers saw this as Christ's incarnation—He "put in his hand" by becoming human, reaching into our world to open the door we had closed. Christ knocks but doesn't force entry—He invites response. The Reformers saw this as prevenient grace—God's loving initiatives that stir hearts toward repentance. The Puritans warned that experiencing stirred affections ("my bowels were moved") must lead to action, not merely pleasant feelings.
